Green Plant Growth

From the Critics

'He has a poetic feeling for broad expanses whether of damp lonely Welsh hills or for the crowded desolation of the industrial desert. The colours play against each other to suffuse a whole canvas with light and depth. His hard training as a draughtsman comes out in the bones of his paintings in a sure and close-knit structure.'

N. HORSFIELD, Arts Council of Great Britain. 1954.

'His progress and achievement is already remarkable. The compositions are well-knit and organised with a thoroughness and seriousness of mood. There can be no question of his considerable gifts'

A. C. SEWTER, The Guardian. 1956.

RAY WATKINSON, Art News. 1957.

'This is intelligent and deeply felt drawing'

'An intelligent painter and a good designer.'

STEPHEN BONE, Guardian. 1957.

'Andre Minaux (Adams Gallery) and Brian Bradshaw (Crane Kalman Gallery) are both young realists. Bradshaw is the one who paints the more interesting pictures. The aspects of his world that he makes real to us are his seas, with all the massive weight of the waves, and his birds flying over the moors.'

DAVID SYLVESTER, New Statesman. 1957.

'These paintings have a quality which penetrate and overmaster an approach which (formerly) must have been easily described as realist. But all realist painting which does not degenerate into naturalism is driven through the barrier of appearances to remake itself as expression. There is a good deal of difference between this contained passion and the high pitch drive of a Munch or Kokoschka, but there is a large area of common territory. This territory is where Bradshaw is now walking, and laying a pretty firm hand on what he finds.'

RAY WATKINSON, Art News. 1958.

'Brian Bradshaw has won many prizes, exhibited widely in London, the provinces, Rome, U.S.A., etc. As an artist he is strong, direct and uncompromising. It is typical that the subjects of his paintings are familiar, intimately known aspects of his surroundings.'

A. C. SEWTER, Manchester Institute of Contemporary Art. 1960.
